10 Luxurious Caribbean Resorts That Are Reopening This Fall

Just in time for the cooler weather, these idyllic getaways are welcoming guests back to the beach.

BY SANDRA RAMANI ON SEPTEMBER 22, 2020

Earlier this summer, numerous Caribbean islands began cautiously re-opening to international visitors, doing so by following governmental regulations and implementing health requirements for those arriving by both air and sea. While there were a few hiccups (the Bahamas, for example, opened and then closed its borders again for a bit), the roll-outs for the most part have gone well—prompting more Caribbean resorts to announce that they will be re-opening to guests this fall.

Whether due to the COVID 19 situation on their islands or because they were still re-building following recent hurricanes—or because they normally close for the summer, anyway—some of the region's top luxury hotels have remained closed since the pandemic hit. From Antigua to St. Vincent, here are 10 top tropical getaways opening their doors between now and the end of the year. Note that opening dates are subject to change according to the latest health and safety guidelines.

Oil Nut Bay

Privacy is key at this 400-acre resort and Marina Village on Virgin Gorda's North Sound, which is re-opening on December 1st, along with the rest of the British Virgin Islands. Guests arrive by boat or helicopter (there are two helipads), then check in to private villas that have been designed to blend into the natural setting. Once settled, enjoy a beach club with three pools and a swim-up bar, a wellness center with two tennis courts, and activities like kayaking, mangrove snorkeling, sailing and movies under the stars. Dining options include gourmet restaurants and a lively Sunday brunch, while rum fans can't miss checking out the "Rum Bible," which features 52 rums from all over the world. If you'd like to stay longer, real estate is available for between $2.95 and $50 million.
